

Mette Verner:

A large amount of knowledge is produced in the academic sector by highly qualified researchers. Most of these researchers - especially those in the top-positions - are still men. But should we really care about this asymmetric distribution of men and women in research? Do women contribute to science in different ways than men?